

How Telephonic Nurse Triage Can Impact Your Landscape Business

With a workforce that can be spread throughout an entire city, county, state, or region, landscape professionals are challenged with developing efficient, consistent, and effective injury reporting methods that can accommodate all circumstances. The majority of the time, injured employees report their accident to their direct supervisor who is then faced with a situation of evaluating the injury and making the critical next decision. Many times, that supervisor doesn't feel qualified to be making such an assessment which can lead to a misunderstanding in protocol, poor communication, slow reaction times, and a delayed process. Regardless of the size of your company, nurse triage can simplify and improve your claim reporting process, provide your employees with instant evaluation upon injury and lower your ultimate claim costs.

Knowing the landscape industry faces this challenge, we are pleased to bring a solution to our policyholders at no additional cost.

150+ Employees

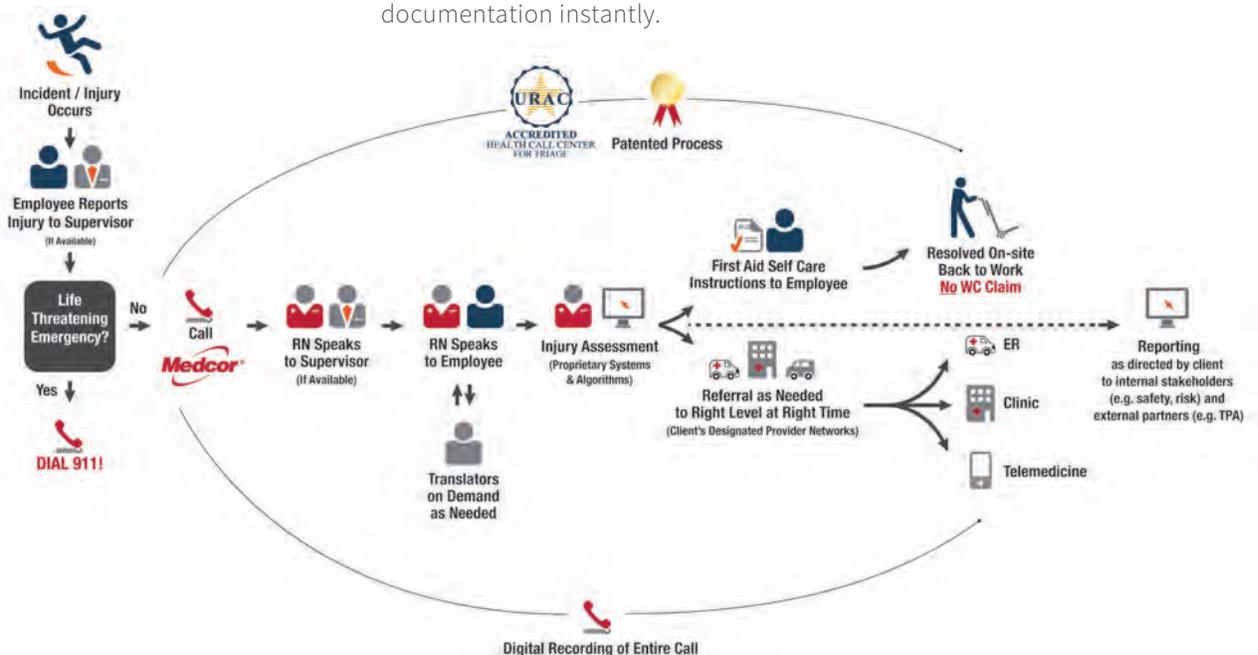

Managing a complex risk mitigation and reporting regimen can be extremely difficult as your company grows. The opportunity for miscommunication and the inability to provide direct supervision on every situation becomes particularly challenging. Consolidate your protocol, streamline your reporting process, and simplify the message to your supporting staff.

50 to 150 Employees

As a regional landscape company, you have a number of different crews working throughout a large radius. When an injury occurs, using telephonic nurse triage can simplify the decision making process for your company. Free your supervisor from having to make the medical evaluation and critical next step for any work related injury. Improve productivity and documentation instantly.

0-50 Employees

Your company might not have many work related injuries; however, when you experience injuries infrequently, it's easy to forget how to properly handle the situation. Telephonic Nurse Triage will simplify the process and get the employee moving in the right direction toward recovery.

© 2017 All rights reserved. Medcor, Inc.